Re: Can a ghost heal? We're never told and there's no description. I assume that "ghosts" are not living people as in, ghosts of humans past (as spirits are considered to be). "People" would be alive and in a present situation. He/she may be speaking of the ghost of a person who had passed. Which I assume means that they are dead.

Re: Can a ghost heal? The idea of a ghost healing indicates that the person is dead, as the person can't 'live' after death. Once dead, the soul of the person was supposed to go to the afterlife (aka Heaven), if you believe in that sort of thing. But if they died and remained alive, the spirit of the person stayed attached to the body (dead but alive) until the body died. At which point, the soul went to the afterlife, leaving the body behind. Re: Can a ghost heal? After death, a soul is released from a body and enters an intermediate state called the "limbo state." The spirit is restless and drives a person from body to body. If the person appears to the living, he may be exorcised, but if not, he's considered a ghost. A real body can't be recognized as the original, but a spirit is recognized as the same spirit that occupied it before death. If two bodies share the same ghost, the person in the first is known as the "primary host" while the ghost assumes the second as a "secondary host." A ghost can only be entered by a human, and if it's successfully entered, the spirit is either released into Heaven (the positive image of the afterlife) or Hell (the negative image of the afterlife). But ghosts generally seem to take the path of least resistance and follow the path left open by a dying person rather than the one actually intended by the primary host. Re: Can a ghost heal? But people can't "heal". I think they heal
