The original French title is a reference to avant-garde cinema. The film was made for the Action Culturelle, an association of French production companies and distributors created in 1930 to enforce quotas for French filmmakers. Cast Marcelle Teroin as Gloria Jean-Claude Dauphin as Gloria's lover Rudy Getz as Captain Robert Maury Marguerite Moreno as Blanche Madeleine Pologne as Madame Sernas René Lefèbvre as Rival film director Jean-Marc Armand as Police commissioner Noël Roquevert as Minister of Defense Paul Ollivier as Minister of Culture Pierre Richard as Minister of Education Edmond Séchan as Minister of Finance Georges Lannes as Minister of Justice Background The film project was devised by Paul Vaillant-Grimal, president of the French Film Promotion Association (Société des Films Français). The Film Promotion Association, itself partly financed by the American government, set about creating and enforcing film quotas for both producers and distributors. In return for accepting the quotas, the producers of the French film industry received the right to display their films at cinemas. To the outsider this appeared an odd arrangement, but it did create a thriving film industry in France and increased the production of films in the country. The government imposed film quotas for the provinces as part of a general programme of cultural regulation. Nine different films had to be screened in each province within a period of five years, and these were subject to strict quotas of production, distribution and exhibition. The quota for 1940-41 was for 50,000 admissions in the provinces. In some regions there was to be a minimum share of French films, for example 10,000 admissions in Alsace and Lorraine. Film censorship The government set up a censorship board to oversee film content
